“A parade is a public march in honour of a special occasion. There are many different kinds of parades. Some parades are exciting and colourful. They have beautifully decorated floats, but also bands, music, brightly dressed marchers and trained animals. Others are serious and dignified, for example, when an army marches on national holidays to show off its equipment and strength.

Parades go back thousands of years. Originally parades were mainly religious. Later on, however, the ancient Romans had joyous parades, which included circus performers, and military parades called ‘triumphs’, which were in honour of courageous generals returning from war.

Let’s look at the different kinds of parades that developed in different countries to celebrate different events. The Chinese, for example, welcome their new year with a lively parade headed by a frightening dragon with silver horns, gold and blue eyes, a green beard and a bright red tongue sticking out of its mouth.

A different kind of New Year’s parade takes place in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania in the United States. Thousands of people dress in fantastic costumes – from spacemen and clowns to African warriors – sing and dance as they march through the streets.

But if a new year is reason for a parade, what about a parade for onions?! In some places in Switzerland, people celebrate the opening of the Onion Market in November with a parade of gigantic onions marching in the public square. The onions have funny faces painted on them. Some are smiling, some are frowning and some even have moustaches!

Finally, another parade of make-believe giant figures takes place every August in a little town in Belgium. These giants are on their way to a wedding! One of the giants is dressed as a bride. She is about to marry a giant called Goliath. Goliath is dressed in armour from head to foot and is carrying a big stick.”
